This theory rests upon some well-known facts in physiciogy, and is confirmed by observation in many directions. Alcohol arrests waste of tissue to a certain degree; it is craved unnaturally, by all who have acquired or inherited any taste for it, in every case of reaction from excitement, of mental or physical overwork, of anamis, blood poisoning, or vitiation or degeneracy of tissue in consequence of heriditary taint, insufficient food, or impure atmosphere. The fogs and swamps of Holland produce the same appetite for gin that is encouraged by the recking garrets and produce the same appetite for gin that is convinced that infant baptism was wrong, and, being thus convinced, he immediately which civilization must teach itself how to cure, or to prevent, as it prevents smallpook by vaccination. The relation between intemperance and mental over; work has been pretty clearly traced and defined.

The report referred to above indirectly firected to collect data and obtain testi-nony, from employers and hands in New England factories and mills, relative to a uniform system of laws to regulate hours Wright canvassed 246 establishments, and ployes, on the general subject, ask-any incidental questions besides. 555 employes, on the general subject, asking many incidental questions besides.

The testimony of manufacturers was conflicting as to the effects of a reduction in the hours of labor upon the milling interests; but the most intelligent seemed to think that hands would produce as much working sixty or sixty-six hours per week. "It would be better for all." wrote one manufacturer: "we would all be happier and better off." Many admitted that a decrease of time and an increase of speed would have -a good effect upon test that a decrease of time and at increase of speed would have a good effect upon employee. Some said the hands would like it better; it would improve their health and be good for them in many ways; others, that it would injure their health and make them idle and careless. Less hours of work the evidence goes to work my proven produces a better class of coarse. Less hours of work the evidence goes to prove, produces a better class of operatives—more skilled labor. As one says, "the most skilled labor goes in for short hours." The majority concur that the shorler labor period benefits employes physically. They get to work more easily; were able to work more assily; are able to work more steadily: there is less sickness; the women and children improve materially in appearance. One or two owners, however, he d that "t would rive them more time to losf around grog hops;" and this is the point where the trongest evidence bears to exactly the cor result—evidence from masters as from hands. "None of my hel would waste their leisure," says one employer; "they are all Americans. Very few but would make good use of their time," "I believe," says another, "that many who now make a bad use of their leisure would improve if they had more." The hands (we are still giving testimony, from the report) want their extra hour tor improvement; it will give them more time to rest and think; the women to sew and do housework; the men to cultivate their gardens. The operatives nearly all say one, thing: That a men would be better off; he would have more rest, more ambition, more chance to imrest, more ambition, more chance to im-prove himself. "Not five per cent would get drunk," says one. "If I did not have get drunk, "saya one. "If I did not have my extra time in my pocket," said another, "I should have it in my bones." A third says, with the earnestness of conviction: "Fewer hours means less intemperance; long hours and poorly paid labor tend to brutalize." "I see the most drunkenness," reports a fourth, "among the overworked and poorly paid." "Intemperance does prevail," says a fifth, "and we think poverty causes much of "it." "Most intemperance," declares another, "Most intemperance," declares another,

'Most intemperance," declares another, 'among those that work the most ong hours induce intemperance the short-hour laborer eats food; the long hour laborer takes stimulants." "Elever hour laborer takes stimulants." "Eleven hours," adds an eighth, "brings a poorer class of help, therefore more intemperance." "People are so run down," chimes in a ninth witness, "that they resort to all kinds of beverages for strength." Evidence of this sort is stronger than any comment can make it. The question of ameliorating the condition of operatives and removing therefrom the influence of bad tendencies and habits, is a humane question, not an economic one; but, if will owners would look into it more carefully, they would see that they have a business interest in it, as well as a charitable one. Better work-people and better work go to-gether, and these make the returns of
